Among their neighbors and friends in Washington it is quite unnecessary to speak in defense of the good name of the department clerks as a body. They are respected in the churches. the literary circles and the general society of the capital, as a part of the best element of the community. In Washington, it is surperflous to explain the need, the intent and the scope of such orders as those recently promulgated in the Treasury department. But outside of the District it may be that these orders may leave a false impression. It should be understood through the country that the department service at Washington does now, as a whole, fulfill the Jeffersonian recipe. It is honest, capable and patriotic. Moreover, it is to a marked degree courteous. It is a rare exception that one who has any legitimate business in a government bureau is not given prompt and polite attention. In this respect the civil service of the United States is so immeasurably superior to that of any other nation that it may be said to be unique. In no other land may a simple citizen gain such ready access to officers of the executive branch of the government, from the President down, or find his business treated so

It can easily be seen that in communities of thousands it may be found necessary to issue strict regulations. But it is not the purpose of WASHINGTON the officers of the administration, in doing so. to discredit the fidelity and value of the clerks Mob law is never to be commended, but the
